Leading health groups call on government to address climate health impacts in National Preventive Health Strategy

32 health groups today released a joint statement calling on the federal government to address climate change in the National Preventive Health Strategy, which is currently in development. The Strategy's Consultation Paper does not include climate change in its six focus areas, nor even mention "climate change".

The groups include: Climate and Health Alliance (CAHA), Australian Health Promotion Association (AHPA), Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation (ANMF), Consumers Health Forum of Australia, Australian Healthcare and Hospitals Association (AHHA) and the Australian Association of Social Workers (AASW). See the full list of signatories in the Joint Statement here or below.

The joint statement says: "A National Preventive Health Strategy that is fit for purpose in the 21st century must address climate change - or it will fail in its objectives."

"The negative health impacts of climate change range from impacts on every human organ system, to disruption of the healthcare supply chain, damage to health infrastructure and threats to the safety and quality of care."

The Strategy's Consultation Paper is open for feedback until 28 September.

Comments:

Climate and Health Alliance Executive Director Fiona Armstrong:

"Climate change poses the biggest threat to health this century. The National Preventive Health Strategy must tackle climate change to protect and promote health. If we don't, everything else risks being done for nought."

"If the government chooses to ignore the health impacts of climate change, they are refusing to prevent that thousands more Australians will suffer from infectious disease, cardiovascular disease, respiratory illness, heat stress, mental illness, violence, food insecurity, poor water quality and poorer nutrition."

Public Health Association of Australia Chief Executive Officer Terry Slevin:

"A national strategy that is targeting the prevention of illness in the Australian population is a key platform through which to highlight the urgent need for climate action - especially in Australia which is particularly vulnerable to the effects of climate change such as extreme weather events and drought."

"The health impacts caused by climate change are far-reaching and of great concern, whether we are talking about increasing bushfires and heatwaves or disrupted food and water supplies; we can't have a healthy population without a healthy planet."

Media contact: Karina Martin, 0450 522 762

Consumers Health Forum CEO Leanne Wells:

"Australia's political leadership needs to ensure that the health and interests of consumers and the community prevail. Policy on climate and health should be guided by science first and foremost as we have largely seen happen with the pandemic. Why should our response to climate change be any different?"

Australian Health Promotion Association President Dr Gemma Crawford:

"We welcome a national blueprint for prevention. But our collective efforts will be undermined if we fail to recognise the impacts of climate change – the biggest threat to the health of our families, communities and planet."

“Building capacity to implement measures to reduce health vulnerability to climate change is critical.”
